Modeling was a lot of fun, and the best part of seeing a finished model get printed is to become a reality. The job was to take an existing flashlight, and redesign the shell for it. The next step of the process, after disassembling the said flashlight, is to hit the drawing board and make a bunch of sketches. This was followed by making a model in yellow foam (or oil foam, or ren if you like... basically I used a very dense foam) to make a layout. after taking the front, side, and top photos I imported them into Alias and started computer modeling. After a few days of working on it (as it was my first real project working with this particular program) I exported it to a 3D printer at school. While I was waiting for it to be printed I rendered the cad model in Keyshot. As soon as I got the model from the printer I went to work grinding the piece in order to get rid of some textures. Then after some picture I wired it, took some photos and had a working flashlight. I would love to take this design into production and make a bunch for friends and family as well as sell them... maybe someday. Imgorhand/Getty Images Consider a dim parking lot. A street lamp where stairs should be used. Rocky path in the mountains... The list goes on.
